

The Revisit Ladder — why going back is the job, not the failure

For: Rohan (Patna) · Priyanshu (Ara & Bhojpur) · Issued: 2026-08-19

The thing you've heard, and what's actually true

You may have heard: "a person needs to see you 7 times before they trust you."

The number 7 is made up. It comes from Hollywood studio advertising in the 1930s — someone said it, everyone repeated it, and it started sounding like a law. No study has ever established 7 as the magic number.

But the idea underneath it is real, and it's one of the most tested findings in psychology:

- Mere-exposure effect — people like a person or thing MORE simply because they have seen it before. Not because of new information. Just familiarity. Proven again and again since 1968.
- Processing fluency — a familiar face is easier for the brain to handle, and the brain misreads that ease as "I trust this person."
- Illusory truth — a message heard several times gets judged as more true than the same message heard once.

So: repetition genuinely builds trust. The number is invented. Some owners say yes on visit two. Some take six months. There is no counter that runs out.

The three catches — read these, they matter more than the rule

1. Repetition multiplies the FIRST impression, it doesn't erase it. Mere-exposure only works when the first meeting was neutral or good. If your first visit annoyed someone, coming back makes it worse, not better. This is why "bas baar-baar jaate raho" is bad advice on its own.
2. Too much becomes irritation. There's a ceiling. The same pitch a fifth time doesn't build trust, it builds resistance.
3. Trust is not need, and trust is not budget. An owner can genuinely like you and still not buy, because he has no test-paper problem or no money this month. Familiarity removes friction. It does not create a reason.

The one rule that handles all three

Never revisit empty-handed.

Repeating the same ask is pestering. Repeating with something new is a relationship.

Why going back feels bad (and why the feeling is wrong)

Going back feels like begging. That feeling comes from believing the first "no" was a decision about you.

It almost never is. On a first visit the owner is busy, mid-class, has never heard of us, and has no reason yet. "Abhi nahi" is not a rejection — it's an owner who hasn't been given a reason.

You are not going back to ask again. You are going back to bring the next thing. That is a completely different act, and owners can feel the difference immediately.

A real one only comes at visit 4 or 5, when he has seen the product, held a paper made for his batch, and been invited to try it with his own students. Anything before that is not a no — it's just "not yet".

Price you CAN say. Money you never ask for.

It starts on a 14-day FREE TRIAL — so there is no payment conversation at this stage at all.

Your ask is always the same: "free trial shuru kar lijiye." Never "kitna doge."

You DO	You DON'T
State the price openly if he asks	Ask for money
Say plainly what's free and for how long	Negotiate or offer a discount
Get them registered and testing	Chase a payment
Say Deepak will connect after the trial	Try to close

Say the price straight when asked. Dodging it makes you look like you're hiding something and kills trust faster than any number will. Being clear costs you nothing — nobody is paying today.

If an owner pushes to talk terms: give him the honest price, then — "Sir, abhi 14 din bilkul free hai. Pehle chala ke dekh lijiye apne students pe. Uske baad Deepak sir aapse baat kar lenge." Then get back to setting up the test.

Your win is an institute actually USING it on the trial — even 5 students, even one batch. Whether they pay afterwards is the owner's call and Deepak's conversation, not your pressure to carry.

That answer is honest, it removes the pressure from the room, and it's how you get to a real yes — because an owner who has already seen his own students use it is a completely different conversation from one who has only heard a pitch.

THE LADDER — every visit has its own job

Never "just following up". Every visit has a purpose and one thing you bring.

#	Visit	Your ONE job	What you carry
1	Introduce + diagnose	Find the pain. Do NOT pitch. Ask the 3 questions and listen.	Visiting card
2	Show	60-second live demo — their subject, on your phone	Phone with app + a test already made
3	Give	Hand over a free printed paper made for their batch. Ask for nothing.	The printed paper + answer key
4	Register + first test	Get them signed up and a test actually run — even 5–10 students is a win	Phone; do it WITH him, on the spot
5	Keep it running	Help them use it for real — a second test, another batch, the weak-topic report	Their results, printed
6	Report usage	Tell Deepak it's live and being used. Deepak takes it from there.	The usage numbers
7+	Stay warm	Once a month, always with something new	New subject, new feature, a result

Visit 3 is the one people skip, and it's the most powerful. Giving something real, made for their students, with no ask attached, changes the relationship more than any pitch. Owners remember who gave them something free that was actually useful.

Only ONE ask per visit. Two asks in one visit reads as desperation.

Do NOT climb this ladder with everyone

The ladder costs you a whole day per institute. Spend it only where it can pay.

Climb it only if 3 of these 4 are true (the qualify check):

- ☐ 10+ paying students
- ☐ Teaches an exam-prep subject
- ☐ Named a real pain about test papers
- ☐ The person you're meeting owns the money decision

Not qualified → stop at visit 1. Thank them, ask "aapke jaan-pehchaan mein koi bada batch chalata hai?", log it, move on. Six visits to an institute with 6 students is six wasted days.

Also stop if: he's said a hard no twice with a real reason, or he's gone cold for 3 visits with no engagement. Log it honestly and move on. A clean no frees a day.

For every institute.

touch #	what I brought	outcome

That's it. Now the question is never "should I go back?" — a question that invites hesitation.

The question becomes: "Yeh kaunsa visit hai, aur main kya le ja raha hoon?"

That question always has an answer. And that is what kills the hesitation.

The short version

1. The "7 times" number is fake. Repetition building trust is real.
2. Never go empty-handed. Same ask = pestering. New thing = relationship.
3. Early "no" is not a no. A real answer only exists at visit 5–6.
4. One ask per visit.
5. Qualify first. Don't climb the ladder with an institute too small to matter.
6. Say the price if asked; never ask for the money. 14 days free — your win is them TESTING it.
7. Ask yourself: which visit is this, and what am I taking?
